From the Vice-Dean’s Corner:

As the winter holiday season approaches, what better time is there to talk about research asset inventory and monitoring. Not the sexiest topic, I know, but very important nonetheless. The assets I refer to are mainly pieces of lab equipment, although some pieces such as computers may include specialized software and databases regarded as significant research assets. We have learned a lot in the past about how we may improve our processes in this area.

An equipment inventory is a planning tool. It provides our Faculty with all the details of our equipment so that: allocation of resources is an objective assessment, and not guesswork (therefore budgets are informed by the actual nature and quantity of equipment owned); we can manage equipment effectively because we are not dealing with unknowns (for example, we know what pieces to include in planned preventive maintenance programs); we can calculate what we can afford to operate or run (therefore we do not overestimate or underestimate the consumables required and can set our recurrent budgets accurately); we can develop realistic plans for the future because we know our current equipment situation (therefore we do not waste funds procuring new equipment while neglecting the replacement of existing essential items).

Maintaining an asset inventory is a responsibility that is shared by equipment users and Faculty administrators. Within the next couple of months, we will be reviewing and revising Faculty policies and procedures for asset inventory, and giving researchers guidance on issues such as how to help track the depreciation of major equipment and regularly monitor its status and maintenance, and how to report lost or stolen items. Our goal is to optimize the capacity of the Faculty to respond to the needs of its researchers.

Wishing you and yours the very best for the holidays,       Jeff
